RE: Taxpayers now face the nightmare scenario - Supreme Court says voters "didn't understand" and were "misled" into approving property tax cap initiative

Because voters approved property tax limiting initiative I-747 in 2001, with a whopping 58% of the vote, taxpayers have saved over $1.6 billion so far. But even with I-747 in effect, property taxes continue to be a huge problem for taxpayers in Washington state.

But today, because of a 5-4 ruling by the State Supreme Court saying voters "didn't understand" and were "misled" into approving I-747, taxpayers now face the nightmare scenario. We're in for absolute chaos. For six years, local governments (counties, cities, ports, library districts, fire districts, cemetary districts, parks districts, etc.) have been held to a 1% levy each year. Their ruling today says I-747 no longer exists, and so local governments now suddenly have the unused taxing authority that they've accumulated over the past six years (5% per year -- 6% instead of 1%). That means that each local government now has the power to jack up property taxes 30% this fall without a vote of the people (I-747 required voter approval -- now that I-747 is overturned, voter approval is no longer be required). Every local government knows that if they don't take advantage of the situation and unilaterally increase taxes using this unused taxing authority, the Legislature in 2008 might take that authority away. They'll have to "use it or lose it." Don't believe a local government would ever raise property taxes in a single year? In 2002, the Port of Seattle jacked up their property tax levy an astonishing 37% using unused taxing authority - they got heat for it but they never repealed it.

We're talking about pigs at the trough with voter-approved I-747 overturned -- it is the nightmare scenario.

The voters' overwhelming "we're tapped out" message from this election, especially the defeat of simple majority for property tax increases, clearly directs the Legislature to adopt the people's 1% limit without change. No one is complaining their property tax bill isn't increasing fast enough. Even with I-747's limits, taxpayers are struggling.

Washington state's crushing property tax problem is a powder keg and it will explode if Governor Gregoire and the Legislature ignore the voters' clear mandate.

The 4 justices who wrote the minority opinion said it well: "No reasonable argument can be sustained that voters were in any way misled or confused by the effect of I-747, which expressly and was specifically aimed at lowering the tax growth to one percent. The majority seems to suggest that the voters are unable to think or read for themselves, when in fact our democratic process is based on the assumption that voters do in fact read and understand the impact of their votes."

-- END --

I-960's vote total stands at 52% yes, 48% no which is really a landslide victory considering opponents spent over $1.1 million, most of it from Washington DC labor unions. To beat them despite their massive opposition campaign made I-960's victory even more satisfying and significant.
